The use of Latin in the Mass and the Life of a Catholic

These days, whenever the question of liturgical language is brought up, most English-speaking Catholics are ready to affirm uncompromisingly their preference for the vernacular. "It is better" one hears often "to celebrate the liturgy in English because one can understand it", the implication being that Latin is not understandable. It is reasonable for someone to humbly acknowledge a need for the vernacular due to his or her ignorance of Latin, but it is tantamount to serious arrogance to impose such ignorance on the entire ecclesiastical community as a general standard and principle applicable to all.

The Latin language is like a major river of knowledge that has watered many people and nations in the course of its long history. And as Pope Benedict XVI writes, "the Church of Rome not only continued to use Latin but, in a certain way, made herself its custodian and champion". It should also be pointed out that the Second Vatican Council, whose authority is often falsely invoked by those who wish to abandon the usage of Latin in the Church, stated plainly that "the use of the Latin language is to be preserved in the Latin rites." (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy No. 36).

Three specific qualities, as St. John XXIII explained, make Latin eminently suitable for being the Church's language: Latin is universal, it is immutable since it is not a national tongue of any particular ethnic group subject to constant change, and it is sacred. The entire terminology of our religion took shape in Latin and its full meaning can only be appreciated in Latin.

In view of the above, it would be absurd to think that the Church might abandon the study and use of Latin, which "is a most suitable bond that binds the Church's present age with the past and with the future." That is why the "Roman Pontiffs have so often extolled the excellence and importance of Latin ... warning against the dangers that would result from its neglect.". Finally, those who frown at Latin should take to heart the words of Pope Pius XI:

"For any member of laity, who is at least somewhat literate, the ignorance of the Latin tongue, which we can call a truly Catholic language, indicates a certain lack of affection towards the Church."
